Investing in the future, nurturing local talent

Investment in the community doesn't have to be limited by corporate social responsibility budgets, argues Mark Loane, managing director of C5 Alliance

TIME is a valuable resource that can benefit both the contributing business and the recipients. C5 Alliance recognises it has the ability and responsibility to make a positive difference in the Channel Islands and has chosen to invest its expertise in nurturing local talent. The company has developed a relationship with the higher-education colleges to attract, nurture and retain emerging technical talent locally, providing both C5 Alliance and other island companies with a qualified and experienced resource pool to draw from in the future. I fostered an ethos of 'the best people and the best projects' since forming the company in 1999 and am a firm believer that supporting young people in a realistic workplace situation is priceless to local businesses.

Simon Brown, one of our 49 highly-qualified consultants, has become a mentor on behalf of the company for students taking the BTEC diploma. Simon has overseen the work placement of the latest student, Thomas Evans, providing him with an opportunity to apply the theory learnt in class to real-life demands.

Simon explains: 'We have asked Thomas to keep a diary of his experiences at C5 Alliance, to help him to remember what he has learnt during his time with us, and to help us understand what we can do to cultivate positive experiences for the students placed with us. In the long run, we are rewarded with recruits who are more enthusiastic, more committed and better skilled - students who complete their work experience ask if they can come back and do more in the school holidays because they enjoy it so much. They are therefore more likely to become long-term employees once they graduate. This will help companies save on recruitment costs, as it increases the chances of recruiting the right people the first time.'

Engagement with local education really is a worthy circle - as more students are recruited and supported in their roles it leads to a greater pool of high-quality potential recruits living locally and a lesser need to essentially employ.

C5 Alliance is a Channel Island IT consultancy with its headquarters in Jersey and with a Guernsey office. On its website the company boasts the most experienced, skilled and qualified team of IT consultants in the Channel Islands: 'delivering solutions to financial institutions, legal firms and governments based offshore; ranging from worldwide system migrations to the development of internet banking applications.'
